INCIDENT DESCRIPTION

I know this incident has already been deemed unworthy of report, but I need it on the record. Over the past several days, I've been finding the museum's one copy of "Of Witches and Other Warnings" where it shouldn't be. At first, it was on the floor near its shelf, where it easily could have fallen if not shelved correctly. A few hours after I put it back, however, I found it on the floor of my office. Then on top of my desk. Each time it's shown up out of place, I've reshelfed it in its proper position.

Just now when I stepped away from my desk for less than a minute, I came back to find it on my desk and open to the poem about The Towering Men. I have no idea who could be moving it. We've seen very little foot traffic in the past few days, and none whatsoever today.

No matter how you look at the situation, we've got one of three things on our hands: a carbon monoxide leak, a truly masterful prankster, or a case of supernatural interference.

Another update: I just looked up from writing this report, and the book is gone. I'm closing the place up early today.
