WALK-INS AND APPOINTMENTS

Hey Detective,

It's been crazy here... After you cleared Jay as a suspect, I thought it might be worth it to reach out to him and see if he could help us. I'm glad he agreed, but the amount of work it took to get him to cooperate almost made me regret ever talking to him. Throughout this whole process, he's been "typical Jay" again and again. Late to our first meeting. Showed up to the wrong place the second. Brought stuff from only one krewe when I asked for three. You get the idea.

And of course he always had a long-winded excuse for how or why he messed up. I hate to say it, but listening to him go on and on was rough because it just reminded me of how I'd made my own share of excuses when it came to Celestine. Those last few weeks she was alive, I just kept making up explanations for how strange and upset she'd been acting because it was easier than filling in the gaps with the truth. Now that I think about it, I guess I've done that a lot. Take my so-called friendship with Ines. She's nothing like the person I met fifteen years ago, and I don't think she has been for a very long time. But did I see it before? No. How am I supposed to find the truth when I don't know if I can even face it?

I guess it's good I'm not alone in this. Even if Jay isn't exactly Sherlock Holmes, he genuinely cares about Celestine and the case. After all that, he was finally able to get me something from each of our non-MKML suspects... Cyril from Versailles, Nonah from Barksalot, and Mason and Dillon from Pirate Bros. Jay's job building floats has him dealing with all sorts of people, and while his charms aren't for everyone, I guess they got him what we needed. For that, I'm grateful.

Some of the stuff he brought me was literal trash (like a half-empty bag of dog treats), but some of it seemed pretty promising. He got us tarot cards from Versailles, pictures from Pirate Bros and Sir Barksalot, and lots of notes and meeting minutes. There's even a live recording, and it seems pretty suspicious to me. Jay had a delivery for the pirate brothers and caught them saying words in some sort of made-up language. I've heard of twins creating their own languages before, and I guess those doublemint creeps are no exception. I uploaded the audio recording to the shared desktop Michelle set up at royalstreetcase.com, and I changed the password to GUMBO, just to be safe.

As for my own krewe, I had to be careful to avoid any prying eyes. Out of the few who've stayed with the krewe, most are loyal to Ines. Meaning, they would probably run to tell her that I was "snooping around" as soon as they could, and I just didn't want to cause any more drama.

While looking around, I found some float plans with Ines's handwriting all over them. If I had to guess, I'd say it was her passing notes to her friend Ashley (or Eye-gor, as Celestine used to call her), which they used to do all the time during meetings. It's really strange writing too, but maybe you could figure out if it has anything to do with the investigation?

I also found a few samples of the sunglasses Celestine had planned for our Year XIV throws. They were sitting in a box in the office, totally forgotten by Ines and everyone else. I sent you a pair so that at least someone can get some use out of them.

With all of the information we now have, I'm really hoping we can narrow our list of suspects even more. Clearing people's names puts us a lot closer to finding the justice Celestine deserves, so take a look through everything and see if one of these suspects has a concrete alibi. When you've got someone to cross off the list, send me an email with the subject line INNOCENT and the full name of the person in the body of the message.

I'll be waiting,

Sylvia Jones
