

Sofia de la Torre

Hello again Detective,

I can't explain what it means to have an expert working on this. Before contacting you, I really thought I was going to hit a wall trying to figure everything out myself. Or be wrongfully convicted of a crime I didn't commit. I didn't realize how much easier it would be to breathe after that was no longer a potential outcome. I'm not going to be totally at peace until we've turned in Nathan's killer, but we've made some great first steps.

We can't get complacent, though. You, me, and Kingston are the only people who are currently taking this investigation seriously. My mother just gives me the same pitying look everyone else does whenever I mention Nathan. And my father just keeps asking when I'm going to find a new coach and get back to practice. As if that's even an option right now.

Kingston's readership seems interested, at least, even if they haven't exactly been leaving any useful tips. I'm still pretty happy to have him as an ally, even though I wish he took the whole thing more seriously. It's all a story to him, but not to me. Still, having access to his sources is worth putting up with some insensitivity.

Plus, he's posted the evidence that clears both his and my names on his blog. It's been a huge relief to be able to walk down the street without being stared at by people who are very obviously wondering if I snapped and cut my mentor's throat.

He gave us a pretty good tip last time we spoke, too: that Harrison has a secret Birdlr account and that he was posting on it pretty consistently on the day of the murder. If we could get into that account, it would give us way more insight into what was going on with him.

My plan is to steal Harrison's phone while he's distracted with practice. I could use it to log in to his Birdlr app, send you screenshots of any incriminating posts, and put the phone back before he ever notices what's happening. First thing's first though: I need his phone's passcode.

As soon as you get this and figure out the passcode, send it to me at threepinescase.com using the password TOELOOP. Remember: We've got to be quick. He won't be in practice forever.

Talk soon,

Sofia