

Edward,

I have been a sentinel in this town for years. I've seen things you cannot fathom. Amateurs and explorers vanishing without a trace. I grew up on the cautionary tales of the Creekside Timber Company, an entire group of men conquered by the woods.

Perceived skill did not save any of them.

But perhaps some more direct knowledge would have. I can see you've followed this path, you and this investigator you have borrowed from Rosemary. I don't know if, like me, they've already warned you, if they've given you a bit more advice, seeing what happened to her and her family. One way or another, here is a little more. I have included something that I hope may help you.

Some may tell you your friends are dead, that you should turn back. They may tell you to leave Burkittsville now and never return, or you will never leave at all. I can only hope that those voices are wrong, that there may be some way of getting out of those woods.

There must be hope we can see those we've lost again.

Harriett