Tank was brought in by his owners with deep wounds on his legs and neck and a fractured right metatarsus. These injuries are consistent with an attack from another animal.

According to his owners, Tank has escaped into the Black Hills Forest multiple times over the past few months, but has always returned unharmed, until this incident. Each time he escaped, including this most recent occurrence, Tank was found in the same location: near a particular petrified tree atop a hill deep in the forest. In my opinion, he may be experiencing a kind of "homing" instinct for this location. While Tank's injuries indicate he was attacked at or near this location, it is difficult to say what animal is responsible.

After discussing the incident with the Kents, I believe they took all the necessary precautions and were not at fault for Tank's escape. Regardless, I have advised them to avoid letting Tank be outside alone, given his propensity for jumping fences and digging holes.

Tank's wounds were cleaned and bandaged, and the fracture set. The Kents have been advised to return daily for dressing changes and the eventual removal of the cast.
