

Sofia de la Torre

Hello Detective,

So, it happened. Remember the evidence we found that suggested Nathan might be involved in some kind of corruption? Well, Kingston sold the story to the biggest skating publication in the country and has been publishing updates on the considerable fallout to boot.

Ever since the article dropped, I've been totally swamped with messages and calls from journalists asking me what I know. I've even been followed home from practice once or twice, which was extremely scary considering how there's a killer on the loose. The other day, I almost pepper sprayed some poor idiot's eyes into liquid because they were hiding out behind my car, waiting to play a surprise round of twenty questions. I constantly have this feeling that I'm being watched.

Beyond just me, the fallout in the skating world has been as messy as you'd expect; the community has totally imploded on itself. Even Kingston himself has taken some flak. He posted a full-on legal complaint he got about the story, and I've started to see some pretty concerning comments on his blog from an anonymous user. I'm obviously not happy with the way he manipulated me, but I don't want some stalker to end up hurting him or something.

One more piece of relevant news: The ASA has launched an internal inquiry. Carol pulled me into questioning as part of that, which was somehow scarier than when the police were interrogating me as a murder suspect. I mean, when that happened, I knew that I was innocent of what the police were saying. But this? If Nathan ever rigged a competition in my favor, then I'd be complicit, even if I didn't know it. My whole career would be built on a lie. I wouldn't have earned any of the things I thought I did. I can't stand not knowing for certain whether that's the case or not.

The worst thing about all of this is how it's been keeping me from being able to help the investigation and finding the truth. Not only is it distracting, but I can hardly sneak around to commandeer evidence with cameras constantly being pointed at me. I managed to get a good amount of potential evidence together, but it wasn't quick or easy.

Enough of my whining about myself though. The only way to get over this is to push through it. The email draft we found on Nathan's computer mentioned incriminating evidence and a second address of Nathan's. More things I didn't know about him. First it was the secret girlfriend, and now it's secret properties around town. And who's to say what the hell it was he was keeping there?

Trick question. We're the ones to say, because we've got to get in there so that I can look around. If there's any evidence that will either exonerate Nathan of corruption or prove his guilt, or that will push this investigation forward, I'd bet anything he'd keep it there.

Clearly, that's where we have to go next. We just need to find the actual address.

If you go to threepinescase.com using EULER for the password and send me the address of Nathan's second house, I'll head over to it and see if I can sneak inside. I'm not sure what I'll find when I get there, but I can tell you now that I'm not planning on leaving until I get the evidence we're looking for.

Talk soon,

Sofia