

Sofia de la Torre

Hello Detective,

The last time I went to the rink, I was attacked. I don't know who it was, but someone tried to hit me with their car. If I hadn't made it inside the rink before the car got to me, you wouldn't be reading this letter right now and the investigation would be over. I filed a report with the police, but I don't think they're going to be able to find out who did it. Whoever left the note on my locker is stepping up their game.

Which means that we've gotta step up our game too. I can't shake the feeling of being followed, and I've been trying not to be alone, but it's difficult.

Kingston and I have more or less made up. He called me to tell me that he feels guilty for reporting that someone was investigating Nathan's death privately; he's worried that he might've put my attacker on my trail. He offered to stay with me until this is all figured out, and I took him up on the offer. He's been sleeping on my couch with an aluminum bat for the past few days, eating all my cereal and forcing me to take breaks in the investigation to watch reality shows where very rich, beautiful women say unkind things to one another over boozy brunches. I find it comforting to pretend like life is normal and low-stakes for a couple of hours. I think he can tell.

Still, even though that may be the case, now's the time to focus on the investigation. We need to get me out of trouble and find Nathan's killer once and for all, before the attacker tries again.

Since we eliminated Lillian as a suspect, we can safely assume that Marcus was working with either Harrison or Carol to take down Nathan as revenge for "stealing" Lillian as a student.

At the end of the day, one of those three people is the person who just tried to kill me. One of them killed Nathan. Problem is I don't know if it's the same person or if it's two different people. That's what we're going to have to find out. After all, I'd hate to catch one killer but leave another loose.

Showing my bias once again, but I think we should probably start with trying to figure out who just tried to kill me.

As soon as you figure that out, send me their name at threepinescase.com using the password FROZEN. We can move on from there.

Talk soon,

Sofia